The Industrial Society promotes the fullest involvement of all people in their work in order to increase the effectiveness of organisations and the satisfaction of individuals in producing the goods and services which the community needs.

The Society is a leading advisory and training body in Britain in man-management and industrial relations. It is independent and self-financing, providing services which include in-company advice and training, courses and conferences, information, publications, audio-visual training programmes and a quarterly magazine.

Its staff includes 70 training advisers with wide, practical experience in industry, commerce and the public services. They include regional advisers who are based at the following addresses:
