I am grateful to the Social Science Research Council for providing funds to enable me to carry out research in nine companies which had previously been the subject of an inquiry by the Commission on Industrial Relations. Guy Harkin assisted me with the fieldwork and Ian McConaghy helped with some market analysis. I am indebted to them. Many busy people were kind enough to talk to us and give us access to their files. The research would not have been possible without their cooperation and readiness to talk freely about their achievements and failures. Often we were told things 'in confidence' or 'off the record' and as is often the case these proved to be the most interesting insights. I hope that I have kept their confidences while writing about them in this book but, if I have breached their trust, I can only apologise and hope this does not lead them to be less helpful to future researchers. Many colleagues and friends, and my parents, have helped me more than they realise in the years it has taken to undertake the research and wrestle with the ideas. David Winchester, Mick Marchington and Kate Purcell read through a number of drafts and made valuable suggestions. Kate Purcell in particular, the fiercest critic of both my literary style and intellectural shortcomings, has done much to make this book better than it would have been. They are of course absolved of any blame for the remaining inadequacies. Joyce Young and Cath Rennie managed to turn my poor handwriting and erratic spelling into polished typescript and to my constant amazement remained good humoured when confronted by the sixth redraft while Denise McNeill and Lynn Fleming keyboarded the whole manuscript on a word processor. My thanks to them.

I am grateful to the Department of Employment Gazette for permission to reproduce Table A.1; and to the McGraw-Hill Publishing Co. to reproduce Fig. 2.1, taken from A Behavioural Theory of Labor Negotiations by Richard Walton and Robert McKersie (1965). Penguin Books Ltd. have been kind enough to allow me to use an abridged extract from pages 178-9 and 181-3 of Understanding Organisations by Charles Handy (1976).
